

Public Involvement

Public involvement is an important part of improving community health and livability. Gathering public input at various stages of a project can help develop projects that draw on and enhance the unique characteristics of each community.

Through our straightforward communication style, ability to engage citizens, and use of the latest technology, we are able to produce successful designs and plans that meet the needs of the community. Our adaptive approach includes informational presentations, videos, public workshops, and weekend walks with citizens to see and discuss neighbors' concerns.

We make contact with neighbors early in the process, identify concerns, and then build confidence by addressing specific issues with a systematic and documented approach. Our resource library of projects around the country is helpful in showing comparable designs to concerned citizens.

Site tours by bicycle provide close-up, first-hand knowledge of the study area and associated issues, and provide an on-site forum for identifying opportunities and challenges.

Alta Principal George Hudson speaks to a group about trail design.

Principal Brett Hondorp presents to parents as part of Alta's Safe Routes to School Program workshop in Solano County, California.